I think all efforts were made to respond to the comments made by the members of the Oversight of the panel and requested changes were made. I had some reservations about the power point presentations to be made by the experts in terms of whether we knew what they were going to say to the slides. This is however difficult to control in reality. Similarly I was concerned initially about the questions which some witnesses might ask of other witnesses as this was part of the formal process and could have introduced bias into the proceeding. However from observing the witnesses giving evidence first-hand, I did not observe anything which would give cause for concern.

I think with hindsight it is difficult to know to what extent the scenarios actually tested reasonable expectations as I think there might have been a tendency for jurors to move into a mind-set of public benefit - ie that certain amounts of data sharing were justified on the basis of public benefit rather than being about what they would expect to happen. I don't think this is a product of bias but maybe reflects the way in which the scenarios were presented.
